SITUATION SUMMARY

Tropical Storm Odile, Eastern Pacific Ocean

Odile is now a tropical storm. According to the Servicio Meteorologico Nacional (Mexico's government weather service), strong torrential rains are expected to continue in Baja California Sur, Baja California, Sonora, Chihuahua, Sinaloa and Durango through Friday where as much as 18 inches of rain may fall. Odile is forecast to continue to weaken and become a tropical depression as it moves onto the Sonoran coast south of Punta Penasco on Wednesday. It is expected to then track northeast into southern AZ by Thursday morning as a tropical depression. The main impacts across the desert southwest will be periods of heavy rain and localized flooding and mudslides with the focus of the heavier rains across southern AZ. At this time, the storm track is much farther east than Norbert was and is not expected to bring significant hazards to CA although isolated thunderstorms with brief heavy rain are possible in the southern CA mountains and deserts through Thursday. The remainder of CA will not be impacted by Odile.

- Due to expected interaction with the terrain of the Sonora, MX, the surface winds are forecast to continue to decrease during the next 48 hours.
- The main impacts for Mexico will be the continued heavy rainfall, gusty winds, flash flooding and mudslides over the next 24-48 hours. Estimated rainfall totals are in excess of 18 inches for a large portion of Baja California and coastal Sonora Mexico south of Puerto Penasco. There are reports of as much as 22 inches of rain in mountainous Baja California
- California will remain outside the primary threat area for this system. While showers and thunderstorms are forecast for much of southeast CA and the southern Sierra, amounts are not expected to exceed 0.75 inches but isolated heavier amounts in excess of an inch are possible in the most intense storms.
- Arizona is expecting periods of heavy rain with possible flash flooding and even mainstream river flooding starting as early as Tuesday night and lasting into Saturday. Flash flood watches have been issued for most areas

Cal OES Southern Activity

There is a potential for extremely heavy rains and thundershowers from the remnants of Tropical Storm Odile. The National Weather Service, Southern Region and southern Operational Areas are monitoring the storm closely and are prepared to take any necessary action.

The following information has been received from Cal OES Southern Region, Operational Area Representatives:

Imperial County - Imperial is monitoring the weather and expect to be able to handle any activities that may need addressing.

San Diego – San Diego is monitoring NWS and is working with their County Flood Control specialists (they have a staffer, Allen Rand, which takes the NWS information and makes localized predictions for them). They have no other current activity but this may change depending on what happens in the next day or so. They have burn areas they are monitoring.

Inyo - Inyo had not heard that the OA might be getting rougher weather. Today's presentation was sent to Kelley Williams. They are looking forward to future forecasts out of Reno, which they will use for planning and preparation. They will keep us apprised of any unmet needs.

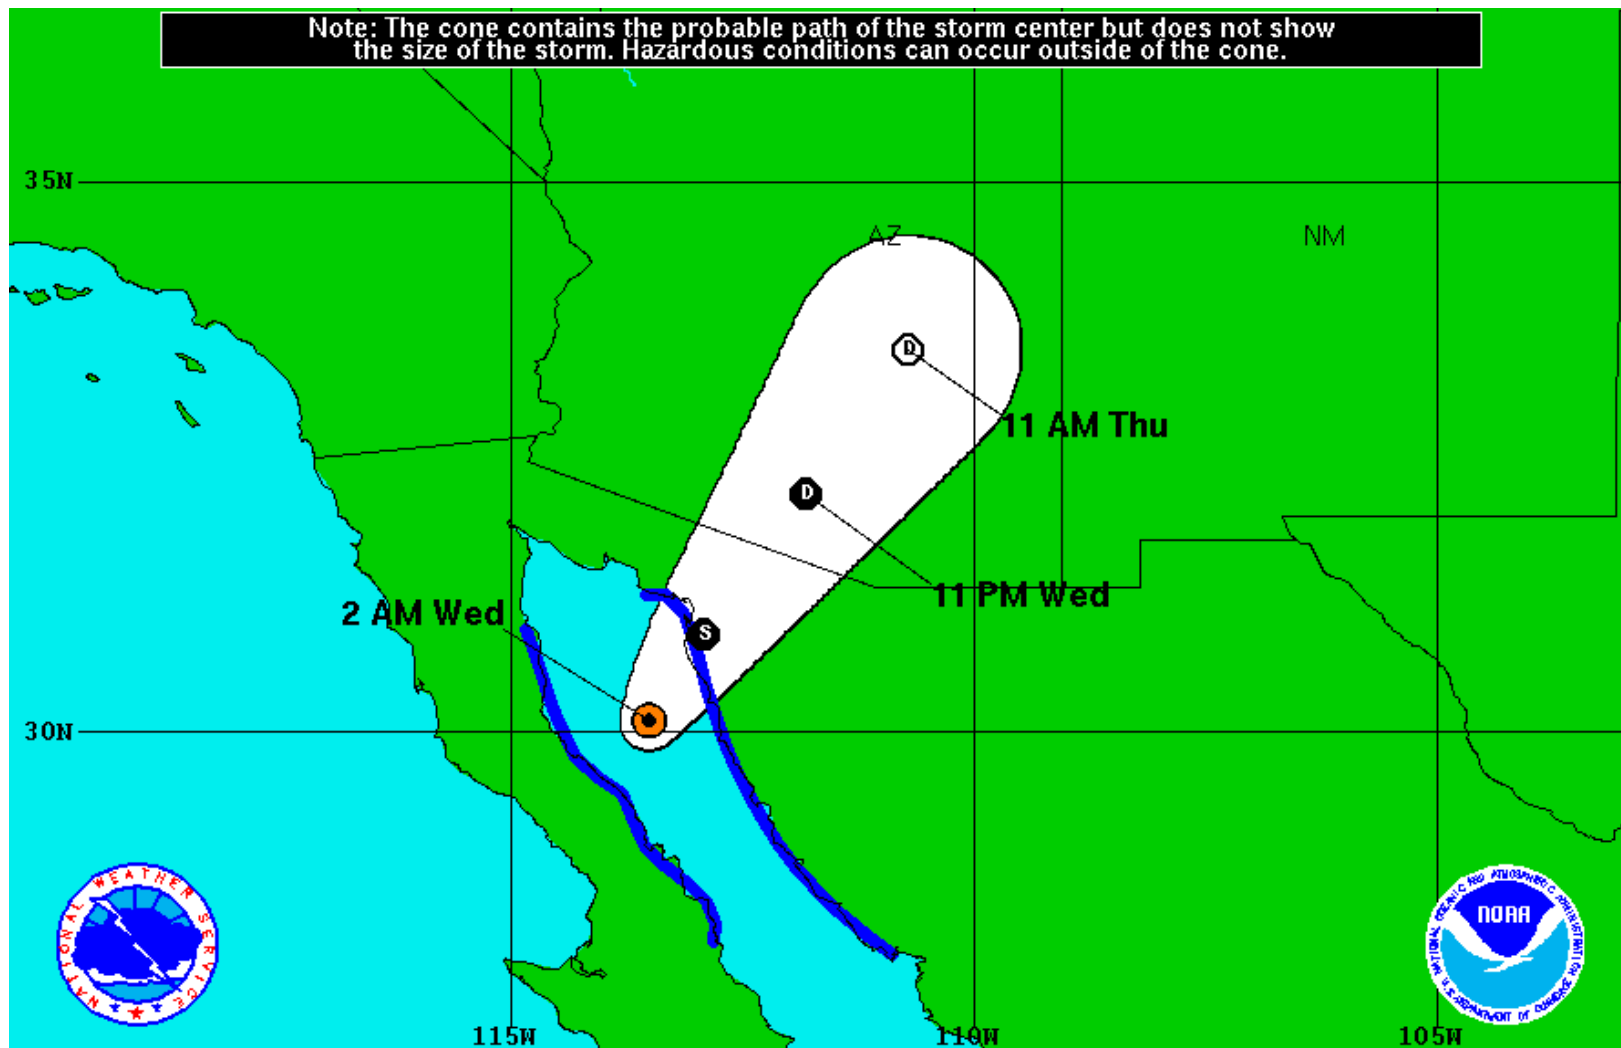

Orange - Orange County issued an Alert OC call to residents in response to a Flash Flood Warning that was issued by the National Weather Service.

San Bernardino - The county is prepared with pre-positioning of resources as well as prepared to hold conference calls with impacted agencies as necessary.

Riverside - The county is pre-positioning sand bags at Fire Stations and monitoring weather and keeping their cities informed of any updates to the weather pattern.

Southern Region continues to reach out to the OA's for updates as the storm approaches. The Southern REOC has prepared a staffing pattern should the need arise to activate.
